I am kinda new to the world of jQuery/Javascript... A: From the jQuery(document).ready documentation: Lifecycle: When the DOM is ready to be manipulated. Whereas from the document.ready documentation: A function to be called when the DOM is fully loaded and ready for manipulation. The key difference there is the word 'ready' versus 'manipulation'. In jquery it's simply a word that applies to a callback you may want to apply to any elements that are part of a document that you want to manipulate. From the jquery documentation: When jQuery detects that the DOM is ready to be manipulated, it runs $(document).ready(handler) on each element in the document, and then invokes the handler when all is done. A: $(document).ready() means "execute what is inside this function once the DOM is finished loading". The function itself takes no parameters, and its only job is to define the code that will run when it is called. $(document).ready() just executes the code that you've written in the function once the page has finished loading. It does NOT define any other behavior. The differences between the two are subtle, but are very important. In a browser that doesn't support the latest version of jQuery, code like this will run correctly: In some browsers, even if you load the tag, the browser won't actually execute the script, so it will just treat it as a file to place in the cache. $(document).ready() does NOT have this "problem", because $(document) will evaluate as the document object (a JavaScript object like document.getElementById('id')) once the DOM is finished
