Natural cytotoxic activity of allogeneic lymphocytes in peripheral blood after cardiac transplantation. Peripheral blood from patients who had undergone heart transplantation was assayed for natural killer (NK) activity against K562 erythroleukaemia and for interferon (IFN) production in response to various inducers. NK activity against the K562 target increased significantly after heart transplantation, although it remained below normal, presumably reflecting the reduction in graft size. The NK activity was a major component of the increased total lymphocyte activity observed in the transplant patients. Peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMC) from some heart transplant recipients were unable to produce IFN in response to Sendai virus and to polyinosinic:polycytidylic acid. In contrast, PBMC from some patients produced IFN in response to Escherichia coli and Escherichia coli lipopolysaccharide, poly(I:C) and interleukin-2 (IL-2), but not to Sendai virus or to phorbol myristate acetate. The observations suggest that NK cells have an important role in mediating rejection of the transplanted heart. 8 B.R. 361 (1981) In the Matter of John C. DAVIS, Debtor. TRINITY UNIVERSAL, Plaintiff, v. John C. DAVIS, Defendant. Bankruptcy No. 80-01299-A, Adv. No. 80-1084-A. United States Bankruptcy Court, E.D. Virginia, Alexandria Division.
