In the early nineties, it was a publication for underground artists. These days, it's been acquired by artnet, a site for contemporary art sales. Like the secondhand shops on the Lower East Side, I like to browse the art magazines at Re/Search when I'm in the neighborhood. At the beginning of this year,

“The Power of Motherhood,” one of the most successful videos of the year, was screened at Re/Search. It was shown in a renovated Art Deco theater and was introduced by artist Mark Behlmer. I’d missed the video in 2013 when it came out, but, at the time, I couldn’t have told you what it was about. During the debate, the House of Commons Economic Affairs Committee noted: "The Digital Currency Bill is an unprecedented piece of legislation. We have seen the emergence of a new and separate industry, which in the UK is regulated as a combination of the Financial Services Authority and HM Treasury. It has been widely praised for its innovation and its speed of development. Now, the Digital Currency Bill brings this new industry under the oversight of a new regulator, which will bring it closer to our existing financial sector." The House of Commons Economic Affairs Committee further commented that this was the first time the Committee had seen such a piece of legislation. Committee chair Nicky Morgan said: "The Digital Currency Bill is a much-needed new legislative framework, which brings together a host of different issues and adopts a fresh approach to regulation for the digital currency industry." Prior to its approval, the Digital Currency Bill passed through the House of Lords in March. The House of Lords Technical Committee noted in its report that the House of Commons' legislation was based on the recommendations of the High Level Group on Digital Currency (HLGDC). This report, together with the Digital Currency Bill, sets out the steps needed to achieve that aim." The HLGDC's recommendations mainly focused on
