I have a couple of issues on my team's Jira instance that we want to categorize based on the issue type and service. For example, let's say an issue has an issue type of defect and a service of product. We want to categorize this issue as product. Then, an issue with an issue type of performance and a service of product should be categorized as "product". The categorize process seems to work, but I see issues with anything in our dictionary being highlighted when I am looking to update worklogs. The color of the worklog is also not changing when I change the category. Do you know how we can solve this problem? Thanks, Tim A: Seems like you're using Classic form of a custom field in Worklog form (contains a list of custom fields), correct? There are two possible issues In Classic form of custom field, there is a special component called Field Managers added with checkboxes on it. If you've noticed it, it is greyed out, what means it's a manager of custom field. It's not a list of any kind of custom fields. Classic form of a custom field with a list of custom fields doesn't have a way to output it's own color with CSS. It's just a list of components. So you probably need to change a form of a custom field. You probably need to use worklogForm for more complete and native form.
