The demo teams include: Borussia. Longitudinal variability of cerebellar volumetry based on data-driven registration. Quantifying the size of the cerebellum is one of the basic steps of quantitative MRI analysis. Conventionally, a volumetric segmentation is performed by manual tracing and tracing-based methods are routinely used for segmentation purposes. In this study, we propose an automatic approach to register image sets acquired with multi-resolution and multi-coverage with an emphasis on longitudinal changes. The proposed method is based on a probabilistic registration framework which uses a patch-based approach and an iterative random walk. The proposed method was validated in two ways, by comparison with the results of the manual outlining method and by intra- and inter-observer variability analysis. Our results show that the proposed method achieved a high similarity with the traditional manual method. Thus, the proposed method should be a strong candidate to be used in clinical settings and longitudinal studies to study the structural changes in the cerebellum. Last night Georgia committed to Michigan State at an Under Armour camp. Over the past two weeks, the Bulldogs have been strongly considered, however, he states he has grown to love Georgia (where he is the nephew of Mark Richt).

“I've always liked Georgia,” McArthur said. “But I really, really like Michigan State. I think I fit best there.” Interestingly, it has been McArthur's strong family ties to Georgia that have been the deciding factor. “I know a lot about Georgia, and I love Mark Richt, and I love for Georgia to be successful,” McArthur said. At 5-foot-10, McArthur is not a physical specimen and in some ways his plan to choose Michigan State might be a favorable departure from the type of athletes Georgia recruits. At Ohio State, where he played from 2013-17, McArthur sat at around 130 pounds, but that has changed. “I dropped to about 145 pounds, which is where I am right now,” McArthur said. “I'm at the end of the season, so I'll probably be a junior.” Just to prove his commitment to Georgia, McArthur will be
