In a new investigative piece for Salon, reporter Glenn Greenwald exposes an egregious new attack on privacy online by the White House. As reported in the piece, the Obama administration has quietly issued sweeping new rules that could allow the government to demand that ISPs turn over the logs of all users' Internet activity. So, instead of having to divulge their own secrets - e.g. which websites you visit - Internet service providers are now prepared to turn over your information, if asked to by the government. This has the potential to be a chilling and dangerous development, not only for privacy, but for journalism. Comments to the White House website are heavily censored by the administration to prevent serious criticism of the proposed rules - and this has grown steadily worse as the proposed rules have become more permissive. Under the proposed rules ISPs are given a choice: either they can disclose what their subscribers are doing online, or they can be fined for non-compliance. As Greenwald writes: The draft rules, discovered by the Electronic Frontier Foundation, propose that intermediaries - a term commonly used to describe Internet Service Providers, such as your Internet service provider, cable provider, and telecom provider - "have an affirmative duty to retain records of the traffic or activity of its users or subscribers for as long as the traffic or activity is retained." Such would be a shocking step down the path to a surveillance state, and one that makes the mass government harvesting of phone records justifiable. Greenwald writes: The new rules are very broad, as they would apply to all traffic crossing an intermediary's network, and would include communications on email, social media sites like Facebook, Twitter and Foursquare, VoIP apps like Skype, video sites like YouTube and online game platforms like World of Warcraft. The rules apply to both metadata (information about the content of communications) and content (the actual content
